

Winnick Family Foundation Supports New Gettysburg Video Production and Broadcast for Children

Production dramatizes the value of historical preservation in a broadcast expected to reach 10 million U.S. school children. "Big Deal at Gettysburg" is designed so teachers can show in three 15-minute segments, with on-line discussion-circle questions and activities for each segment to bring social studies, language arts and citizenship lessons to life.

LOS ANGELES CA – September 10, 2009 – The Gettysburg Foundation will be filming a new educational film later this month that will be broadcast nationwide to an expected audience of 10 million school children. The new production, “Big Deal at Gettysburg – The Value of Historical Places,” is funded in part by the Winnick Family Foundation.

Said Foundation founder Gary Winnick: “This is a unique script with a strong, contemporary female lead that highlights for children how conflicts between land development interests and the cause of historical preservation can be negotiated and resolved. The main character, Elizabeth Grayburn, is presented as a current-day business executive who comes to Gettysburg with her young son in tow to negotiate a land deal important to her own career advancement. She leaves understanding that historic value sometimes trumps property value.”

Gettysburg National Military Park, which has National Park status, and the independent Gettysburg Foundation are co-producing the broadcast, which is the latest in a series featuring the famed battlefield – including two productions that won Telly awards for excellence in children's television programming.

The National Park Service, which is charged with preserving and managing public access to the battlefield, began auditions this week for actors and actresses who will appear in the production. Shooting will take place in late September in and around the Gettysburg area.

In addition to the grant from the Winnick Family Foundation, this year's broadcast is also underwritten by Bob and Marion Wilson and it is an official program of the Ford Motor Company Fund Education Center at Gettysburg.

"Big Deal at Gettysburg" is designed so that teachers can show it in three 15-minute segments, with on-line discussion-circle questions and activities for each segment. Teachers will be able to use these tools to bring their social studies, language arts and citizenship lessons to life. The broadcast and accompanying lessons were designed in accordance with the National Council for the Social Studies curriculum standards and themes.

Said Gary Winnick: “My family and I also hope that this new production encourages more school children to visit this site so important to American history. With a newly opened Museum and Visitor Center and many rehabilitation projects continuing on the battlefield, the National Park Service and the Gettysburg Foundation have substantially restored Gettysburg's historic integrity.”

Added Winnick: “As a result, visitors have new opportunities to see the battlefield the way the soldiers did at the time of the fighting in 1863. Battlefield rehabilitation is also creating a sustainable environment by improving wetlands, water quality and wildlife habitat – making the battlefield and its surrounds even more precious as an outdoor classroom for school children and their parents who are able to visit this national treasure.”
